A Word From The Editor...

Post-mortems give us explanations when explanations serve no useful purpose to what's dead. Small comfort to the deceased that pneumonia instead of cancer killed him or to the murder victim that he was shot before he drowned.

The other day a friend did a post-mortem on a now defunct, formerly prestigious, publishing house. "The trouble was," she opined, "that a bunch of new salesmen didn't go after contracts. They thought the respected name would do the trick forever, but it didn't."

The what-went-wrong analyzers feel better, I suppose, when their data is processed. Why the candidate got killed at the polls, why the predicted football champs were slogged before playoffs, why the speech stopped breathing halfway into the "attention step" — such post-mortems provide jobs for pollsters and reporters and professors. But unless the survivors profit from the ex-post facto examinations, there seems little value (apart from curiosity satiation) in wondering why the dead got that way.

When my friend was reflecting on the demise of a great corporation, I thought about that classic speech of Bruce Barton's, "Which Knew Not Joseph." Being the sagacious adman he was, Barton knew that a product — or whatever — must be kept before the public eye day-by-day. "The fact that you told your story yesterday should not lead you into the delusion of supposing that you have ever told it," Barton warned. New generations, like pharaohs, rise up knowing nothing of a once popular product.

Barton, of course, was more interested in preventing death than in explicating it. His admonition to keep the product visible and appealing makes good sense to all of us who want to spare our chapters the futility of a post-mortem. Every year the graduating PKD'ers take with them their knowledge and memories of the fraternity. Within four years, or less, a chapter can be dead. Thus, all the officers and sponsors have a continuing responsibility to make the ideals and activities of Pi Kappa Delta known to each succeeding class.

This Is Seattle!
